

The Three-Footer Streak

As far as golf drills go, they don't come any simpler than this one. To perform the three-footer streak drill, you set up three feet away from a hole on the practice green and roll in as many putts in a row as possible. If you are a little shaky with your short putting, it might be a good goal at the start to just make five in a row. However, as time goes by and you improve on your mechanics, you should be able to easily make 10 straight – if not many more than that.

To add variation to this drill, you can vary your distances anywhere from three to five feet. For example, you could start at three feet with the goal of making five straight putts. Once those five drop in, you move back to four feet and do the same thing. If you are successful at four feet, you attempt to finish off the drill with five more makes from the five-foot mark. If any of your putts along the way miss the cup, you go back to three feet and start over.
